

Summary

In excellent winter weather our main task was to plug some of the boundary gaps. The large gap at the southern end, near the kissing gate, was blocked by sinking a number of posts and attaching stock fencing. The extremities were blocked with substantial logs attached by wire to the posts. The unofficial pedestrian entrance on the western side was partly blocked by logs wired to posts, low enough that pedestrians can step over but creating a barrier for motor bikes. Other tasks including cutting down scrub that was blocking the view of the entrance sign by the kissing gate, felling two fair-sized sycamores near the northern end of the western path to provide material for blocking other boundary gaps in that area, and the usual litter pick.
